

The Flat
Friday

Darling leg, I have been wondering today whether they had transferred you from Langley since there has been no mail from you except for Monday night's letter which told me you'd arrived back safely. I hope that you are not in any hospital again.

It was really bitterly cold here today & when I arrived home I sat and toasted my toes with relish before a lovely fire, and I couldn't help wondering about my darling. Hoping that he was sitting somewhere cosy too. How you must have missed the comforts of home during your years in the Navy!

Have you been to see Blanche yet?
And how is Ernie keeping?

I doubt if I shall go down to see the folks this weekend as I am on duty tomorrow, and on Sunday I hope to shampoo my hob, & do a little washing. Course if you should come up the line again I shall just down tools, and have a wonderful time instead.

Joan & Frank were due to come over today but maybe it was too cold to trip baby all this way.
Instead of the usual family evening around the fire, with baby as Centre of attraction we have had a quiet evening knitting.

Yesterday I arrived home to

And the kitchen clouded with steam, and a great bubble-bubbling issuing from the stove. Yes! mum had the puddings on. Boy!
They look & smell gorgeous. Do hope you can manage Xmas dinner at home. Whatever happens you'll have a goodly slice by post.

I've bought more Xmas draw tickets than that - but I'm never lucky enough to win a prize. I suppose you can't be lucky in everything, eh honey, and I've got you.

I had to see Inelae today He asked about you. When I mentioned your voice - he said he remembered you having it before denying the winds. Peckambit must be those toots of yours!

What is the latest verdict Cherub? I expect I shall have a letter from you in the morning which will answer all my questions. And I am full of wanderings about my beloved tonight!

And that is all for now cos this is the last page of my pad. Must get some more tomorrow & write a real budget.

"You are always in my heart."

Love you, have you
